Introduction

One of the things that hindered the proper development of Judaism in America was the lack of qualified religious “functionaries.” From 1654 until the middle of the 19th century the religious needs of the few small Jewish communities in North America were served by a variety of layman, “reverends,” and Hazzanim. Few had more than a basic yeshiva education. Indeed, the first ordained Orthodox rabbi, Rav Avraham Rice (1802 – 1862), did not arrive in the United States until 1840. Rav Rice found religious chaos within the Jewish community of Baltimore where he served.

There was one man who came to America just before the turn of the 18th century who possessed an excellent yeshiva education. Israel Baer Kursheedt (IBK), having studied in the famous Yeshiva of Rav Nosson Adler (1741 – 1800), was the first Ashkenazic Talmud Chocham to come to America. As a result, his knowledge, leadership, and sage counsel were of inestimable value to the Jewish communities in which he resided.

Youth, Yeshiva Studies, Wartime Business

Little is known about the early life of IBK. He was born at Sing-hafen, Germany near the Rhine on the 4th day of Pesach in 5526. (April 6, 1766). His father passed away when he was young, and his mother then relocated to the village of Kursheidt, near Königswinter, where he spent his childhood. At this time many German Jews did not have family names, so Israel Baer took as his surname the name of this village.

Apparently he demonstrated exceptional intellectual abilities, and this induced friends of his family to send him to the Yeshiva of Rabbi Nosson Adler in Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Rav Adler, a celebrated Talmudist and Kabbalist, attracted a number of excellent students who later became well-known rabbonim, the most famous being the Chasam Sofer (1762 – 1839).
Among IBK’s fellow students were two who particularly distinguished themselves and attained considerable eminence - Rav Avraham Bing (1742 – 1841) and Rav Wolf Heidenheim (1757 – 1832). Rav Bing became the Chief Rabbi of Wurzburg, and his students included Rav Jacob Ettlinger, Rav Nathan Marcus Adler, Chacham Isaac Bernays, and Rav Seligman Baer Bamberger. Rav Heidenheim is known for his many literary publications, including a Hebrew commentary on, and a German translation of, the Machzor.

According to the above cited articles from the Asmonean and the Occident, Rav Nosson Adler held these three students in equal estimation. Rav Adler used to say that Reb Avraham was a charif (acute logician), Reb Wolf a medackdek (grammarian and philologist), and Reb Yisroel a chochem, a wise man whose accomplishments in Torah learning were universal.

IBK’s studies in Rav Adler’s yeshiva were interrupted by the outbreak of the French Revolution and General Adam Custine’s invasion of Frankfurt in 1792. He was forced to find some means of earning a livelihood and, in some way or another, was able to obtain a contract to supply the Prussian army with provisions. It is quite amazing that this young man, who had spent his life in a cloistered yeshiva environment, was able to navigate the inherent dangers of doing business during wartime and also able to deal with gentile military officials.

Coming to America

In 1795, as a result of the peace of Basil, the Prussian army on the Rhine was disbanded, and IBK’s military business endeavors ended. He then decided that he would leave Germany, a country where Jews were at that time treated as less than second class citizens, and immigrate to England where he would try his luck in business. In 1796 he went to Hamburg with this intention. However, in Hamburg he heard of an American sloop, the Simonhoff, which was preparing to sail to Boston. A friend had told him that this city had a burgeoning Jewish community, so he changed his plans and booked passage of this ship.

IBK may not have realized the difficulty of crossing the Atlantic in this relatively small (seventy to eighty ton), one-masted ship. The voyage took seventy days, and IBK, who spoke virtually no English at the time, was probably the lone Jew aboard. He was fortunate in that the captain of the ship became kindly disposed to him and did his best to make IBK’s time aboard as comfortable as possible.

IBK was at sea during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. He often related how on Erev Yom Kippur he managed to communicate to the captain the nature of his observance of this Holy Day. He had the captain get an English bible, and, using the Arabic numbering of the chapters and verses to find those dealing with Yom Kippur, he pointed them out. In this way the captain came to understand what he was doing. He also used this device to get the captain to understand and assist him with some of his other religious needs.

America

When IBK arrived in Boston some time towards the end of 1796, he discovered that there was no synagogue. Indeed, the entire Jewish community consisted of one family! As a result, he stayed only a short time in Boston and then traveled to New York.

“Israel Baer's first impressions of Jewish life in New York must have left him crestfallen. In material terms, the Jewish community consisted of a synagogue building on Mill Street dating back to 1730, an adjoining hebra [meeting place and schoolhouse], the minister's house, and a cemetery on Chatham Square. Its upkeep was the cause of frequent outbreaks [disagreements] among the trustees of Shearith Israel; until 1825, it would be the only Jewish cemetery in New York City. They [the Jews of New York] knew little of Jewish traditions. Neglect, apathy, and petty bickering were pervasive.” (The Seixas – Kursheedts, pages 29–30)

It did not take IBK long to make the acquaintance of Rev. Gershom Mendes Seixas, who served as the Chazzan of Congregation Shearith Israel for almost fifty years and whom historians often refer to as the patriotic Chazzan. “Out of his commitment to Judaism, Israel Baer soon developed a warm working relationship with Shearith Israel's hazzan of many years, Gershom Mendes Seixas. Born twenty years before Kursheedt and raised in New York, Gershom did not have the benefit of Israel Baer's education. Quick to appreciate the value of Israel Baer's learning, Gershom increasingly turned to him for advice in resolving questions regarding Jewish law. That Israel Baer was Ashkenazic and Seixas Sephardic did not hamper their relationship.” (The Seixas – Kursheedts, page 30)

One must keep in mind that at that time and for many years afterwards IBK was the only real rabbinical scholar to be found throughout North America.

On January 18, 1804, he married Sarah Abigail (Sally) Seixas (1778–1854), the eldest daughter of Chazzan Seixas. Sarah was the favorite child of Rev. Seixas, and IBK became his favorite son-in-law.

In New York IBK went into business. “He had his share both of prosperity and of adversity, like all other men. But the one never rendered him arrogant, the other could not cast him down. There were in his character two remarkable traits that still kept him upright and enabled him to preserve the serenity of his mind: trust in God and good opinion of men. He was incapable of believing in the bad intentions of others. And though he, more than once or twice, suffered severely from his confidence being abused, he could not be persuaded that the cause was other than imprudence or folly on the part of those through whom he suffered. His trust in God was firm and not to be shaken, as it sprung from his profound conviction of the truth of his religion and consequently in the wisdom and goodness of Providence.” (The Asmonean)
Communal Activities

As a man with a growing family, it was only natural for IBK to become involved in the Jewish education offered by Yeshibat Minhat Arab, which Shearith Israel had established in 1731. He believed strongly that Jewish education was “the first thing that ought to be pursued in life.” With this goal he worked diligently to expand the curriculum of this yeshiva.

In 1808 IBK was appointed to a committee of six to draft a detailed proposal and regulations for the reorganization of the yeshiva into a real Jewish day school for boys and girls. The school remained active until 1822. Its aims, as articulated by Israel Baer, were: 1) to instruct students in religion and morality, 2) to make sure their actions are in harmony with these teachings, and 3) to “impress on their minds the excellence of our belief.” In 1810, in recognition of his service to the Jewish community, IBK was elected parnas (president) of Shearith Israel and served for one term.

“Israel Baer fought many battles at Shearith Israel; not all were victorious, especially in matters involving ingrained customs. In 1809 he and other forward-minded congregants attempted to restrict Mi she-Berakh prayers, made on behalf of individuals called to the Torah (for which it was customary to make a donation to the synagogue) to three per person. The plan was not adopted.” (The Seixas – Kursheedts, page 35)

Richmond, VA

By 1812 the Kursheedts were the parents of four children. However, IBK must have had trouble supporting his family in New York, because in this year he relocated to Richmond, VA in hopes of finding more lucrative business opportunities in the South. He and his family traveled by land, while his valuable library of Jewish religious books were shipped by sea. Unfortunately, this ship was the first prize taken by the British in the War of 1812. It was brought to Bermuda and sold. Miraculously, several years later much of his library was returned to him. IBK never knew who it was who was responsible for this extraordinary act of kindness.

While in Richmond IBK took an active part in Jewish communal affairs. He served as the third Chazzan of Richmond’s first synagogue, Kahal Kadosh Beth Shalome (The Holy Congregation, House of Peace), from 1812 until 1824. While residing in Virginia, IBK became acquainted with Thomas Jefferson and even visited him on more than one occasion at Monticello. (The Seixas – Kursheedts, page 42)

Return to New York

In 1824 the Kursheedts, now a family of 11, returned to New York, where IBK resided until his passing in 1852. New York’s Jewish community had changed a great deal in the 12 years the Kursheedts had lived in Richmond. The majority of the Jewish community was now of Ashkenazic background, and they were unhappy with the Spanish-Portuguese (Sephardic) ritual of Shearith Israel, the only synagogue in the city. In 1825 in an attempt at compromise, IBK organized a separate Ashkenaz minyan at the synagogue. The leaders of the congregation, however, refused to let the minyan continue, and Congregation B’nai Jeshurun, New York’s second oldest congregation which followed Ashkenazic ritual, was established that same year.

In about 1834 IBK played a key role in the establishment of Hebra Terumath Hakkodesh, which aided the poor of Israel. On August 19, 1840 he chaired a gathering of New York’s Jewish community to protest the Damascus Affair. “When a Franciscan friar and his Muslim servant disappeared, the Jews of Damascus were accused of having killed them to use their blood for Jewish Passover rites. A number of Damascene Jews were arrested and tortured to make them ‘confess’ to the crimes. Some Jews died; even Jewish children were taken prisoner.” (The Seixas – Kursheedts, page 46)

His Last Days

In The Rise of the Jewish Community of New York Hyman Grinstein writes on page 220, “Israel B. Kursheedt, whose rabbinical knowledge was undoubtedly outstanding in the city in the first half of the nineteenth century, was a retiring person who rarely went out of his way to make his influence felt in the community. When he was approached on legal or ritual problems, he would prepare an answer; occasionally he led a movement or made a suggestion. His leadership was not aggressive, nor did he leave any books as tangible monuments to his scholarship.”

Another reason why IBK did not play a larger role in public affairs was because there were very few people in America at the time who could appreciate the extent and value of his learning. However, perhaps more importantly, he had a very marked influence on his nine children. He made sure to give them the best Jewish education he could. The result was that all married Jewish spouses (save for one, who never married) and were strongly attached to Judaism. This was no small feat in light of the high rate of intermarriage in America during the first part of the 19th century.

According to the Asmonean obituary, IBK was more than beloved by his family – he was almost idolized. His family devoted themselves to caring for him during the last two years of his life when he was ill and suffering. During this period he was confined to his home, and many came to visit him simply to be in the presence of a man who was a living example of a true Jewish patriarch.

He passed away at age 86 surrounded by family and friends. Someone present at his passing, witnessing his serenity of spirit, “involuntarily burst out in the words of Scripture, ‘May I die the death of the righteous, and may my end be like his.’”
